Curtain Call: The Story Of A Traveling Theatrical Group Called Erwood Big Stock Co.

Synopsis

Curtain Call is a historical book I wrote about my great grandmother Annie Hawthorn Tevis Erwood. Stage Name June Mora. She and the Erwood Stock Company traveled in a vaudeville circus in the late 1800's to early 1900's and made it to the big time. It was not without struggles. The times were a lot different. I included photographs and newspaper clippings that tell their tale of struggle in this kind of profession. This was a different era the vaudeville theatre. This story will be remembered as a great book.

“Curtain Call: The Story of a Traveling Theatrical Group” is a fascinating look into the early days of American show business through the adventures of a family with sawdust in their blood. The author, Lorayne Neely researched her show business family tree back to the 1870s; the theatrical bug struck a 10-year old in a school Christmas play. From there the book evolves from a traveling minstrel show through various stage show productions, even a circus on a boat. Along the way, this family encountered a devastating tornado and later narrowly avoids one of the worst theater fires in history and a fatal train wreck. Luck ran out when the Spanish flu epidemic nearly wiped out the family, leaving four young sisters in a convent. Neely's grandmother who nearly became a nun was the oldest of those girls and married a former New York entertainer who had become a successful dancing teacher who booked entertainers. It's an interesting read that illustrates the roots of today's entertainment.
